Week 1 Reflection

One of the most important concepts I learned from this week was from the article by Leon-Demare et al. (2015) regarding King's theory of goal attainment. It is important to understand this theory when looking at patient communication and relationship and how her theory can completely change the interactions between the nurse practitioner and the patient to meet a common goal. These aspects are important as I prepare for my future role as a nurse practitioner so I can begin to incorporate this theory into my practice now and prepare for my new role.

I feel prepared for my future role as a nurse practitioner from the experience I have so far as a nurse. One important thing I have incorporated into my career as a registered nurse is nursing caring theory. I understand its importance and I will continue to learn and grow my skills based on these theories as I transition into my role as a nurse practitioner. I feel unprepared in how I will integrate these theories because my role will be much different in many ways as a nurse practitioner. I look forward to learning and practicing the integration of theory into my role as a master's prepared nurse practitioner.

Week 2 Reflection

I achieved the objectives of the week through my discussion post and conversation about Carper's Ways of Knowing. Connecting real life experiences to the theories discussed this
